OUR FUTURE EASTERN POLICY. The Statist, discussing our future policy in view of the English guarantee, says that, assuming that Turkey will agree to something tangible, and that we shall have a reasonable equivalent for our engagement to defend Asia Minor against Russian attack, the chief point in our bome policy ought to be very clear. A large and permanent increase of the home army is indispens able. If we are to keep to our engagements at all we may have to meet at any moment a hostile incursion from Russia on some 'e point of the extended frontier which we gas tee. We shall be able, it is assumed, to drill au Auglo-Turkish army in Asia Minor which will give a good ac. On London. count of any Russian invasion. But no one can be quite sure what the Anglo-Turkish force will be until it is created, while it is obviously politic. in an empire like that of England to maintain the central force in some sort of proportion to all the dependent forces. Such things as mutinies have to be faced, and our ultimate reliance is on our home army. While this should be our home policy, our foreign policy should atm, first of all, at agreeing with Russia upon a definite frontier-line ever the whole length of territory where we are virtually in juxtaposition. Our next sim should be to improve the communications of the whole country-Asia Minor, Persia. and Afghanistan—on that side of the border-line which may be fixed as English. A SONG OF MODERN LOVE. Give me that branch of like, dear (Full of what sweet crushed fragrances!) Out of your bronst, as if so near It lay to where your breathing is That it is perfumed with your breath! I would be naught but what I am; Your lover—just no less, no more. I would not have the right to claim One flower, and lose the right to implore: With joya possessed, such sorrow entereth-

I take the flower I pleaded for, And it becomes my very own. Where is its charm? Upon the floor I strow the poor bruised blessoms down, And he may guther them who will! I touch your hand—to let it go: I kiss your lips—and turn aside.
